LONGSWORD +1:

A plain military blade with a worn crossguard. Given to her by the garrison commander when she left service. She has never named it.

BOOTS OF ELVENKIND:

Soft grey-leather boots that make no sound on any natural surface, stone, wood, mud, leaf litter. Sable has had these for two years and they are the reason she is still alive. Her Move Silently in these boots is effectively 75% outdoors.

POTION OF HEALING:

Standard preparation, 1d8+1 hp. Cork-stoppered glass vial in an oilskin wrap.

PERSONALITY

- Talks to herself in the forest. Has been doing it for years. Does not realise she does it.
- Very patient. Will wait longer than any other party member before concluding that something is gone, dead, or not coming back. This is both a virtue and an occasional problem.
- Takes the owlbear personally. Not because it attacked her, it didn't, but because she watched it cross the southern meadow six weeks ago moving normally, and she knows what it was before it became this.

Sable Crane

HUMAN RANGER

You worked game warden patrol in the roadwoods south of the Thicket for four years before the garrison was cut and you were let go with back pay and a handshake. You have been working the same routes freelance ever since – leading trapper parties, scouting for merchant groups, the occasional boundary survey. You know the Thicket’s southern approaches better than anyone currently alive in Ringstown who is not missing.

You knew something was wrong before anyone official acknowledged it. The birds told you. Or rather: the birds stopped telling you things, which is how the forest tells you that an area has gone bad.
