MAGIC ITEMS

LONGSWORD +2:

A straight-bladed sword from a Shield Lands armoury, etched with the unit number of a cavalry regiment that no longer exists. No special powers beyond enchantment.

POTION OF EXTRA HEALING:

A dark amber liquid in a ceramic vial sealed with red wax. Restores 3d8+3 hit points. Calder has been carrying this for two months and hasn't needed it yet, which he considers either lucky or ominous.

RING OF PROTECTION +1:

A plain iron band on his right hand. Contributes to his AC. He does not know where it came from, it was in an evidence box from a previous commission, unclaimed.

PERSONALITY

- Economical with words. States objectives, checks progress, moves on. Not cold, just efficient.
- Has a professional respect for competence in others regardless of class or background. Will follow a good plan from anyone.
- Does not use the dust. Has watched enough soldiers get creative with questionable substances and knows how that ends.

Calder Mourné

HUMAN FIGHTER

You spent twelve years riding with the Shield Lands heavy cavalry. You were good at it. Then the regiment was dissolved in a political restructuring you have no interest in explaining to anyone, and you found yourself moderately experienced, moderately paid, and without a unit. That was four years ago.

Since then you have been taking independent security contracts. Escort work, clearance operations, the occasional thing that does not have an official name. You have built a reputation for following through, which is the only reputation in this line of work that actually pays.

You know Ranger-Captain Elnara from a previous job. You do not discuss the details of that job. What you know about her is: she is precise, she does not waste words, and she is not in the habit of exaggerating threats. When her letter arrived two weeks ago – “Something in the Thicket needs ending. Your kind of work. Standard rates.” – you accepted without asking for details. You have learned that asking for details from Elnara is unproductive.

The cargo contract was simple enough. A gnome named Blink Tinderflip needed two coaches driven from Critwall to Ringstown, sensitive cargo, deliver intact to Elnara. You took the coachman role on one of them. You didn’t ask what was inside. You never do.
